He was a good communicator and pacifier. He lived by two rules: people are either ashamed or afraid to do something. So, we were involved in many activities around the farm; he allowed us to try any occupation we came across, such as blacksmithing and others.

I did not work for other people; I worked from my family, doing everything from scratch. For example, when he used to bring workers home, he would sit us with them to learn.

I did not do well in school, and I only got certificates of appreciation from the school's library. At one point, I participated in an international science and engineering competition and won. Being from a small village and participating in such an international competition, meeting people from different countries was unique. I also met a teacher in my village, he taught in the Gulf country, and he introduced novel teaching methods based on group work and cards.

Grey symbolises my first love experience. I was in a relationship with a girl, and when we broke up, it affected me a lot. At one point, I did not attend any of my classes. At graduation, I had several certificates from trainings and workshops I attended.

Everything they teach us at school does not give us enough information about the reality of work. I had many opportunities but lacked the skills to invest in them and turn them into my own business.

I watched a movie on National Geographic that a fisherman caught a rare fish and because it was very rare, they made a movie about it. So, imagine how important this fish is. But when they asked him how he caught this fish, he told them: I used to go daily to catch this fish and throw any other kind of fish back to the sea. They asked him why, isn't it a loss for you? He replied that if he kept the other fish, he would earn money and lose his passion for catching this one-of-a-kind fish. I refuse jobs that don't provide me with the opportunity I dream of, and I was adamant that this company would succeed.
