BIRMINGHAM

Methods and Messages

BfP Women's Group conducted extensive surveys to find out women's priorities for the city centre, in contrast to Birmingham City Council 's minimal public consultation, "The (residents) weren't living there so they didn't have to engage with them"

(BFP WOMEN'S GROUP MEMBER)

The women's group addressed the planning authorities' poor communication and information by producing accessible publications with clear language and witty visuals. "lots of people don't know what the council does or that there are different departments and how you make your voice heard... And it just drives me mad when people use so much jargon." BFP WOMEN'S GROUP MEMBER

Participation: empathy and time

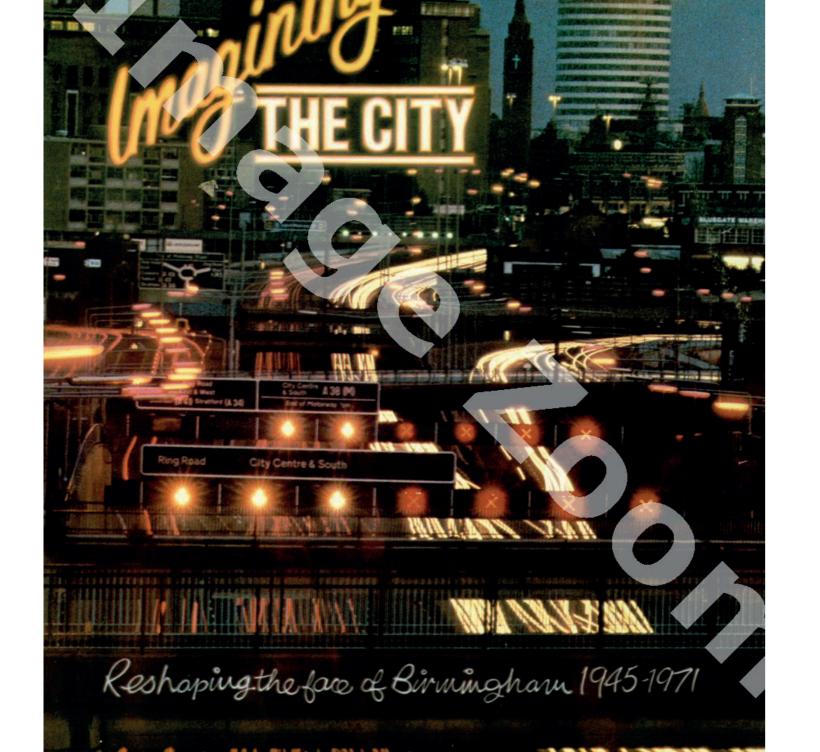

The women's group' took an informal, empathetic approach,

"I think kind of structurally it is different. A woman with a trestle table in the market, talking to other women, is straightaway different from a man with a clipboard. Because I still think that if you see the official-looking man with a clipboard who's talking jargon, women will say what they think they're expected to say.... I don't think they do so much woman to woman" BFP WOMEN'S GROUP MEMBER

BfP Women's Group went to where women were, taking time to encourage their views and participation. Residents' participation in the women's safety group on the Bloomsbury estate in Nechells, for example, "took time to build up really, for the women to have confidence".

Communicating through the arts

There is a history of Birmingham women using art, film and photography to communicate ideas about the built environment. In 1986, photographer

Roy Peters, historian
Jude Bloomfield and designer Brian Homer produced a critique of post-war redevelopment in Imagining the City exhibition. And in 1988, Heather Powell directed Paradise Circus, raising

many issues that were subsequently taken up by BfP Women's Group.
